While you can take a look for and does not have to be signed in., and the jurors were led to believe that he had some special intimacy with the jurors and their families. (Tr. 836). The State argues that the question was proper as it illustrated Richard Evans' thinking processes, and attempted to emphasize that Evans was not afraid of the jury and was familiar with them. The State contends that the trial court's limitation on the scope of the question was reasonable to avoid undue prejudice. The State argues further that the trial court in its instructions to the jury properly warned the jury as to the defendant's prior criminal record, and the prosecutor's reference to such records. *577 It is well settled that the State may properly comment on the lack of evidence when it is reasonable to infer from the evidence that the defendant's testimony is not worthy of belief. The State in this case had placed in evidence an assault on the victim by defendant, and had also established that defendant had a substantial criminal record. The State in its argument could properly comment on the lack of evidence that defendant assaulted the victim. The limiting instruction to the jury that the State's attorney merely asked Evans for a circumstance that might cause him to change his testimony was insufficient to cure the State's improper arguments. (Tr. 822). Where, as here, the State persists in its improper argument, it leaves us with no alternative but to reverse. Reversed and remanded for a new trial. DRUCKER and LORENZ, JJ., concur. NOTES [1] Although we will not list all examples, we do note that the prosecutor does not appear to have objected at trial to the comment that Evans was involved in a violent act in the past. We cannot see how the trial court could have cured the impression left by such a comment on defendant's credibility. The State's failure to make a timely objection to the comment in the trial court precludes review of that comment on appeal. State v. Norman (1976) 171 Ind. App. 28, 355 N.E.2d 279
